markets, in USA and Australia etc. carrying irradiated foods as reported in the Hindustan Times of 15th January, 1989 ;

(b) whether it has been made obligatory to label irradiated foods and foods containing irradiated ingredients;

(c) whether Government are aware that there is no test yet which can detect irradiated foods;

(d) whether Australia Government have banned food irradiation until tests as in (c) above are developed ; and

(e) whether such a moratorium as in (b) above will be imposed as a measure of abandon question?

THE MINISTER OF STATE IN THE MINISTRY OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY AND THE MINISTER OF STATE IN THE DEPARTMENTS OF OCEAN DEVELOPMENT, ATOMIC ENERGY, ELECTRONICS AND SPACE (SHRI K. R. NARAYANAN) : (a) to (e) Government is aware of the controversy regarding food irradiation. The US Food and Drug Administration has cleared irradiation of food upto a dose of 1 Kgy and spices upto 30 Kgy. Australia has not banned food irradiation but has decided not to introduce the process until such time as a method of distinguishing irradiated food from non-irradiated food as developed.

Currently about 28 countries have adopted the process of irradiation to prolong the shelf life of various food items. A joint committee of FAO, WHO, and IAEA has cleared all food items which are irradiated upto an overall average dose of 10 Kgy as safe for human consumption. Therefore, there is no valid reason for imposing a moratorium on food irradiation. However, detailed rules under the Atomic Energy Act of 1962, are being evolved by Government to ensure safety for consumers before clearing irradiated food for consumption in India.
